Europe is a continent that is home to over 50 countries. It is bordered by the Atlantic Ocean to the west, the Arctic Ocean to the north, the Mediterranean Sea to the south, and the Ural Mountains to the east.

This book provides an overview of the perspectives from Europe and the CIS on various issues, including security, economics, and energy. It also examines the challenges and opportunities facing these two regions in the 21st century.

Security

Security is a major concern for both Europe and the CIS. The two regions face a number of common security challenges, including terrorism, organized crime, and nuclear proliferation.

Europe is also concerned about the security of its energy supplies. The majority of Europe's energy comes from Russia. This makes Europe vulnerable to supply disruptions from Russia.

The CIS is also concerned about security. The region is home to a number of unresolved conflicts, including the conflicts in Nagorno-Karabakh, Transnistria, and Abkhazia.

The CIS is also concerned about the security of its borders. The region is bordered by a number of unstable states, including Afghanistan and Iran.

Economics

Economics is another important issue for both Europe and the CIS. The two regions are facing a number of economic challenges, including slow growth, high unemployment, and rising inflation.

Europe is also concerned about the economic impact of Brexit. The UK is one of the largest economies in Europe. Its exit from the EU will have a significant impact on the European economy.

The CIS is also facing a number of economic challenges. The region is heavily dependent on oil and gas exports. The decline in oil prices has had a negative impact on the CIS economies.

The CIS is also concerned about the economic impact of sanctions. The EU and the US have imposed sanctions on Russia in response to its annexation of Crimea.

Energy

Energy is a critical issue for both Europe and the CIS. The two regions are facing a number of energy challenges, including the need to diversify their energy supplies and reduce their dependence on fossil fuels.

Europe is heavily dependent on oil and gas imports. The majority of Europe's oil and gas comes from Russia.

The CIS is also heavily dependent on oil and gas exports. The region is home to some of the world's largest oil and gas reserves.

Both Europe and the CIS are working to diversify their energy supplies. They are investing in renewable energy sources, such as solar and wind power.
