Part One: General Principles

The first part of the Systematic Representation deals with the general principles of the law of obligations. This part covers topics such as the concept of an obligation, the sources of obligations, the performance of obligations, and the extinction of obligations.

Windscheid's analysis of the general principles of the law of obligations is characterized by its clarity and precision. He provides a clear and concise definition of an obligation, and he carefully distinguishes between the different types of obligations. Windscheid also provides a detailed discussion of the sources of obligations, including contracts, torts, and unjust enrichment.

Part Two: Specific Obligations

The second part of the Systematic Representation deals with specific obligations. This part covers topics such as the sale of goods, the lease of property, and the carriage of goods.

Windscheid's analysis of specific obligations is detailed and comprehensive. He provides a thorough discussion of the legal principles governing each type of obligation, and he provides numerous examples to illustrate the application of these principles.

Part Three: Unjust Enrichment

The third part of the Systematic Representation deals with unjust enrichment. This part covers topics such as the concept of unjust enrichment, the remedies for unjust enrichment, and the defenses to unjust enrichment.

Windscheid's analysis of unjust enrichment is insightful and groundbreaking. He provides a clear and concise definition of unjust enrichment, and he carefully distinguishes between unjust enrichment and other legal concepts such as contract and tort.
