

The First 50 Years of the International Library of African Studies: A Retrospective

The International Library of African Studies (ILAS) is a publishing imprint of Indiana University Press dedicated to publishing scholarly research on Africa. ILAS was founded in 1970 by David Henige, who served as its director until 1994. The series has published over 500 books, including monographs, edited volumes, and translations. ILAS books cover a wide range of topics, including history, politics, economics, anthropology, sociology, and literature.

In the early years of ILAS, the series focused on publishing works by African scholars. This was a time when African scholarship was often marginalized by Western publishers. ILAS provided a platform for African scholars to share their research with a wider audience. In the 1980s and 1990s, ILAS began to publish more works by non-African scholars. This reflected the growing interest in African studies among scholars around the world.
