The Show's Format

Each episode of Three Blind Dates follows three single people as they go on blind dates with four potential partners. The daters are matched by a team of experts who use a variety of factors to determine compatibility, including personality, interests, and values. The daters then go on a series of dates with their potential partners, and at the end of each date, they rate their experience on a scale of 1 to 10. The dater with the highest average score at the end of the episode gets to choose one of their dates for a second date.

The Algorithm

The algorithm used to match the daters on Three Blind Dates is a closely guarded secret. However, the show's producers have said that it takes into account a variety of factors, including personality, interests, values, and physical appearance. The algorithm also considers the daters' past dating history and their preferences for certain types of partners.

The Results

The results of Three Blind Dates are often surprising. In some cases, the daters end up with partners who they never would have met on their own. In other cases, the daters realize that they are not as compatible with their potential partners as they thought they were. The show has also been credited with helping some of the daters find love. In one episode, a dater named Sarah went on a blind date with a man named John. The two of them hit it off immediately, and they have been dating ever since. Sarah said that she never would have met John if it weren't for Three Blind Dates.

The Pros and Cons of Three Blind Dates

There are a number of pros and cons to Three Blind Dates. On the plus side, the show can be a great way to meet new people and potentially find love. The algorithm can also help to match daters with partners who they are compatible with. On the downside, the show can be stressful for the daters, and it can be difficult to open up to someone on a blind date. Additionally, the show's format can be somewhat limiting, as the daters only get to go on a limited number of dates with each potential partner.

Three Blind Dates: Dating By Numbers is a unique and innovative approach to dating.
